SEE

Second-hand platforms that feel disorganized or unsafe.

Few visible sustainable clothing initiatives on campus

Sustainability initiatives with good intentions but poor execution.

Students constantly buying fast-fashion items.

A gap between sustainability discourse and daily behavior.

Thinks

"If it's inside the university, I trust it more."

"I want my actions to reflect the values I teach."

"Selling or donating clothes shouldn't take so much time."

"I don't have the energy to coordinate exchanges with strangers."

"I prefer quality over quantity."

"Sustainability has to be practical, not idealistic."

SARA

30-35 years old teacher at Universidad de los Andes

Does

Donates clothes occasionally, but inconsistently.

Buys functional, durable, and neutral clothing.

Avoids impulsive purchases but still buys out of necessity.

Distrusts the quality or hygiene of informal second-hand markets.

Keeps unused clothes stored "just in case."

Avoids selling clothes due to time and coordination effort.

Feels

Responsible for setting a good example for her students.

Skeptical of informal or unverified second-hand platforms.

Guilty about having unused clothes in good condition.

Frustrated by the lack of sustainable options that fit her schedule.

Overwhelmed by academic and administrative responsibilities.

Comfortable when solutions feel safe, structured, and university-backed.

Motivated when sustainability is easy and frictionless.
